How to improve the necessity test of the European Court of Human Rights

Janneke Gerards*

According to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, interferences with rights protected by the European Convention on Human Rights can only be accepted if there is a proportionate relationship between the interference and its legitimate objectives, that is, if they are "necessary in a democratic society." The Court has given shape to this test by developing standards such as that of the existence of a "pressing social need" and of "relevant and sufficient" reasons. However, these standards appear to be rather vague, and the Court's case law on the test of "necessity" lacks transparency. For that reason, this article proposes the introduction of the more classic three-part test of proportionality in the Court's case law. The article focuses on the use the Court might make of two particular elements of this test, that is, the test of suitability and the least-restrictive-means test. If applied correctly, the systematic application of these tests can contribute to the clarity and persuasiveness of the Court's reasoning.

1. Introduction

The fundamental rights contained in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR or the Convention) are not absolute.<sup>1</sup> Interferences with most of the Convention rights are acceptable as long as a reasonable justification can be provided. Best known in this respect are the justification clauses of Articles 8–11 of the Convention, which stipulate that limitations on the rights contained in these Articles are justifiable if they are "necessary in a democratic society" for the protection of one of the enumerated public policy interests. Other provisions of the Convention do not contain such express justification clauses, but in many cases the

The alpha (1)-adrenoceptor agonist norfenefrine caused an increase in glycerol level in adipose tissue that was similar to that observed with the physiologic alpha (1,2)-beta (1)-adrenoceptor agonist norepinephrine, whereas the alpha (1)-adrenoceptor antagonist urapidil showed no effect on basal lipolysis rate.

The Harmonisation of EU Copyright Law: The Originality Standard

Thomas Margoni

1 Introduction

Almost 25 years have gone by since the first EU Directive in the field of copyright was enacted (Directive 91/250/EEC of 14 May 1991 on the legal protection of computer programs now consolidated in Directive 2009/24/EC of 23 April 2009). As with many other directives that followed, that Directive was “vertical” in scope, meaning that its “harmonising” effects were limited to the specific subject matter therein regulated (in this case, software). Similar examples of “vertical harmonisation” are found in the field of photographs and databases as well as in almost any other EU Copyright Directive, making this fragmented approach a typical trait of EU Copyright law harmonisation. The reason for what could be labelled ‘piecemeal legislation’ can be linked to the limited power that the EU had, until recently, in regulating copyright. As it can be easily verified from their preambles, all EU Copyright Directives are mainly grounded in the smooth functioning of the internal market. It is the internal market – rather than copyright – that has driven the harmonisation of EU copyright law to date.

Nevertheless, if we look at the entire body of EU copyright law today (the so called acquis communautaire) it certainly appears much more harmonised than what may be suggested by the above. The reason for this “unexpected” situation can most likely be found in the fundamental role that the Court of Justice of the European Union (ECJ) has played in interpreting and – some would argue – in creating EU copyright law. Using the example of the originality standard, this paper offers an overview of the past and current state
