Abstract

This study is based on a plan of collecting different matrices (hair, eye, muscle, liver and kidney) in order to define a strategy for the control of the illegal use of clenbuterol in bovine production. Of all matrices utilised, hair is recommended for the analytical control of clenbuterol in living animals, due to its being permanently available and easy to collect. The eye or rather the retina, is the matrix which gives the most trustworthy result, after the animal slaughter, and the one that best helps in the determination of the illegal use of clenbuterol in a perspective of gradual food safety improvement.

1. Introduction

The number of medicines used to promote animal growth has been increasing exponentially, mainly due to the modern practices of intensive animal husbandry.

Although clenbuterol (4-amino-3,5-dichloro-o-[(tert-butylamino)methyl]benzyl) alcohol hydrochloride) is authorised in the veterinarian therapeutics of bovines, equines and pet animals as a bronchodilant or as a tocolitic agent in cows [1]; it has also been illegally used [2,3] to promote animal growth, causing a considerable increase in muscular mass and, at the same time, a decrease in fat accumulation [4,5]. However, in some cases, the presence of non-negligible amounts of drug residues in meat is a real public health problem and various food poisoning situations have been described as being due to clenbuterol residues in liver and meat [6–13].

In order to define a strategy for the control of the illegal use of clenbuterol in bovine production, a plan of collecting different matrices (hair, eye, muscle, liver and kidney) was performed. Thus, the purpose of this study was to define a possible ideal moment of analysis for each one of the utilised matrices, which must be applied to meet the current quality standards of food safety.

Japanese Corporate Warriors in Pursuit of a Legal Remedy: The Story of Karoshi, or “Death From Overwork” in Japan

“Let’s think about slavery, then and now. In the past, slaves were loaded onto slave ships and carried off to the new world. But in some way, aren’t our daily commuter trains packed to overflowing even more inhumane? And, can’t it be said that today’s armies of corporate workers are in fact slaves in almost every sense of the word? They are bought for money. Their worth is measured in working hours. They are powerless to defy their superiors. They have little say in the way their wages are decided. And these corporate slaves of today don’t even share the simplest of pleasures that those forced laborers of ages past enjoyed; the right to sit down at the dinner table with their families.”

Toiling selflessly for the company has long been a romantic sentiment in Japanese culture.² It exemplifies perseverance in the face of difficult odds and devotion to the company—cardinal virtues under the Japanese work ethic.³ Such values are termed kaishashugi in Japanese, literally “companyism.”⁴ These values have, moreover, been attributed as the primary impetus that lifted Japan from the ashes of World War II into its current status as one of the world’s wealthiest countries.⁵

Japan’s phenomenal economic achievement has not gone unnoticed. Even in the United States, critics of modern liberal democracy are calling for less emphasis on individual rights and more on Japanese-style communitarianism.⁶ Such critics hope for increased productivity and economic gain like the
