Abstract

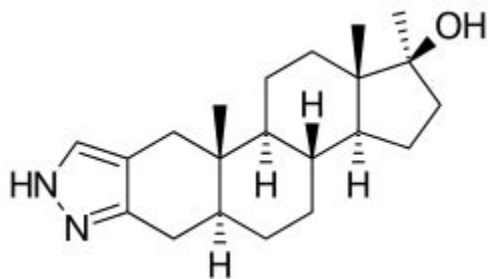

Background

Randomised controlled trials (RCTs) are essential for evidence-based medicine and increasingly rely on front-line clinicians to recruit eligible patients. Clinicians' difficulties with negotiating equipose is assumed to undermine recruitment, although these issues have not yet been empirically investigated in the context of observable events. We aimed to investigate how clinicians conveyed equipose during RCT recruitment appointments across six RCTs, with a view to (i) identifying practices that supported or hindered equipose communication and (ii) exploring how clinicians' reported intentions compared with their actual practices.

Methods and Findings

Six pragmatic UK-based RCTs were purposefully selected to include several clinical specialities (e.g., oncology, surgery) and types of treatment comparison. The RCTs were all based in secondary-care hospitals ($n = 16$) around the UK. Clinicians recruiting to the RCTs were interviewed ($n = 23$) to understand their individual sense of equipose about the RCT treatments and their intentions for communicating equipose to patients.
