Pill mill laws hamper police

After Florida toughened its laws, operators found fertile ground up I-75.

By Witoughy Mariano wmario@ajc.com and Andrea Simmons asmmons@ajc.com

The two Florida brothers who opened a lithium pain clinic in February 2012 are not physicians. They're not nurses or pharmacists, either. But their lack of health care experience did not prevent them from owning Premier Medical Management, a Georgia-based medical management company. In Georgia, the owners of clinics that prescribe the most addictive pain pills on the market are free to have records as money launderers and financial scammers. It's legal for them to be convicted felons, too. Larry and Randy Webman are all of that and more.

Big brother Larry, 64, and two companies he controlled paid $10.1 million in fines and restitution to the federal government in 2005 for what investigators described as a fraudulent investment scheme. Little brother Randy Webman, 59, served two federal prison terms for laundering money from cocaine sales and committing mail fraud related to a rare coin scheme. Pill mill continuation A14

IN-DEPTH COVERAGE
In Georgia, deaths from prescription drugs far exceeded those from illegal drugs, according to law enforcement. When The Atlanta Journal-Constitution analyzed 2011 legislation establishing a prescription monitoring program, it found efforts fall short of what the state needs to combat pill mills. As a result, Georgia risks becoming the prescription drug dealer to the South.

Snowfall
A howling storm swept through the Northeast, dropping as much as three feet of snow and leaving about 650,000 without power. Although severe, the storm was not as dire as the Blizzard of 1976, often held as a benchmark.

Deaths
At least six deaths (the toll continues to climb) were blamed on the snowstorm, including an 18-year-old boy who was overcome by carbon monoxide as he sat in an unrunning car to keep warm while his father shoveled snow.

Air travel
Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines resumed flying to New York on Saturday. Other Northeast flights will begin today. More than 5,000 flights were cancelled, with nearly 150 from out of Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport.

Former legislator faces monumental question: Can anyone succeed?

The direction of leadership the past decade at the DeKalb County School District might be described as herky-jerky. Some might call that an understatement.

In 2002, school board members picked an outsider, Johnny Brown, to shake things up as superintendent. He did and was sent packing two years later. They went the warm and familiar route next time around with longtime principal Crawford Lewis. He talked about "healing" but now faces criminal corruption charges. Insider Kamona Tyson held the post for a couple of years until Cheryl Atkinson came in from Ohio to shake things up. Now she is gone, too.

Rural school funds at risk

Gov. Deal's plan would end subsidy, could cripple tiny districts.

By James Salzer jsalzer@ajc.com

Some of Georgia's tiniest, most out-of-the-way schools face fiscal calamity as lawmakers struggle with whether the state should continue a special subsidy for remote districts. These are school districts in places where the county's entire enrollment isn't as large as the freshman class at one Gwinnett high school. Students have the same teacher in ninth, 10th, 11th and 12th grade for basic subjects such as math and English. Advanced Placement and other special classes are severely limited or nonexistent; the counties typically have almost no tax base, making them all the more dependent on state funding. Now Gov. Nathan Deal is proposing to end the $2.6 million, decades-old "parity" Schools continuation on A17

GUN DEBATE

Female gun owners drawn to way of life

For many, it's not political; it's sport and a means of protection.

By Katie Leslie kleslie@ajc.com

Sybil Lee has lots of hobbies, she knits, she quilts. She raises money for three-day breast cancer walks. And she shoots guns. At least once a week, the 29-year-old Dahlonega woman visits the Bulls Eye Marksmen Gun Club in Cumming. And every other Thursday, she meets with a group called Sisters in Arms for a ladies' night at the range. There, they try out each other's pieces, hold target practice and afterward head to a nearby restaurant for margaritas. For Lee, owning and shooting guns isn't a political stance.
